

Build it once

You write a good brief, get a useful result, then next Monday you open a blank chat and do it again from memory — slightly worse, because you forgot two things. You didn't build anything. You just had a good day.

What goes in each half

HALF

WHAT BELONGS THERE

Never changes

Save this part

Who reads it and how they read it. The format. What to cut. What not to invent. Where your judgment ends and its begins.

Changes weekly

The only new input

This week's notes, the threads you starred, last week's version for continuity.

THE MOVE THAT MAKES IT COMPOUND

When something comes back wrong, fix the brief, not the output. Dragging a bullet into place solves today. Adding one line to the saved brief solves it forever. Do that three or four weeks running and the brief gets genuinely sharp.

- a Don't overthink where it lives. A note in your notes app is completely fine. The only requirement is that you can find it in under ten seconds on a Monday morning — if finding it is annoying, you'll skip it and go back to typing from memory.
- b Save the brief, not the conversation. You don't need the output from three weeks ago. You need the instructions.
- c Reuse isn't only about time. Same brief in, same standard out — the instructions stop drifting, so quality gets repeatable and not just faster.
